PREFACE

"I think I shall be among the English Poets after my death." These prophetic words were uttered by Keats not with presumption, but rather with the self-assurance of a man of genius. Humbly confided in a letter to his brother, in the gloom of approaching sorrow, in the face of unjust and bitter criticism, with the work to verify them yet undone, and the finger of death already upon their author, they claim our deep admiration. Dante, Shakespeare, Milton, and Wordsworth early displayed a self-confidence in their literary powers, but faced no equal discouragement. That Keats spoke with true foresight, there is now no doubt. Matthew Arnold placed him with Shakespeare; Browning ranked him with Milton as one of a "superhuman poet-pair"; and Tennyson said: "He would have been among the very greatest of us if he had lived. There is something of the innermost soul of poetry in almost everything he ever wrote." These estimates may be too high; qualifications and explanations may be demanded; but they are far removed from the neglect and contempt accorded Keats in his own day. Although he died at the age of twenty-five, he has left the world unmistakable evidence of greatness: poetry that ranks with the best in our literature; in the words of Rossetti, "many a 'thing of beauty,' which will remain 'a joy for ever.'" Since the appearance of the last volume of his poems in 1820, he has been "among the English Poets."

Year by year the fame of Keats has become more secure, as the truth and beauty of his poetry, the significance of his message, and finally, the sterling qualities of his manhood, have become better understood. The faults in his work—his occasional lack of restraint, errors in diction, supersensuousness, weakness in narration—whatever they may be, have not been overlooked, nor can they be explained away; but they have rather been pardoned because of his inexperience and in the light of his subsequent achievements. The beauty and melody of his verse, the richness of his diction, the felicity of his phrase, the profusion and concentration of his imagery, his return to the Greek spirit in nature and myth, and finally, the perfection of art in his best work, will ever afford keen pleasure to the lovers of good literature.

Keats, it is true, can never be a popular poet. He did not seek public favor through any corruption or distortion of language, or by thrilling narrative, or by social, political, or religious controversy. He lived in the realm of art, learned its great language, reveled in its beauty, and strove to bring a message to the leaders of men. He was, as he said, "ambitious of doing the world some good," but that could not be until he had attained "as high a summit in poetry" as his endowments would permit. "I have not," said he, "the least contempt for my species; and though it may sound paradoxical, my greatest elevations of soul leave me every time more humbled." The purport of his message and philosophy was to reveal to the world "the mighty abstract Idea of Beauty in all things"; to make clear by his poetry that truth and beauty are identical and accompanied by lasting joy. Such was his protest against the world that is too much with us, the unfeeling materialism and industrialism to which society was tending—his plea for sweetness and light. But since the general public, as a rule, is blind to the practical value of æsthetics, and since his message was one that "no gross ear can hear," Keats, like his great teachers, Milton and Spenser, must remain the poets' poet.

We are slow to comprehend how men of genius without education, in the common acceptation of the word, can, at an early age, produce remarkable works of art—grasp, as it were, the eternal verities. The rise of Shakespeare, for instance, has proved a great mystery—a mystery which time has made more profound and difficult to explain. "Others abide our question. Thou art free." In the case of Keats the marvel, which has been admirably described by Mrs. Browning, is not less:

> By Keats's soul, the man who never stepped
> In gradual progress like another man,
> But, turning grandly on his central self,
> Ensphered himself in twenty perfect years,
> And died, not young (the life of a long life
> Distilled to a mere drop, falling like a tear
> Upon the world's cold cheek to make it burn
> For ever),—by that strong excepted soul
> I count it strange and hard to understand
> That nearly all young poets should write old.

Unlike Shakespeare, Keats abides our question. In the words of Lord Houghton, "Here is a surgeon's apprentice, with the ordinary culture of the middle classes, rivaling in æsthetic perceptions of antique life and thought the most careful scholars of his time and country, and reproducing these impressions in phraseology as complete and unconventional as if he had mastered the whole history and the frequent variations of the English tongue, and elaborated a mode of utterance commensurate with his vast ideas." Literary criticism can certainly have few more interesting and instructive tasks than an adequate explanation of Lord Houghton's statement. How did Keats, with no advantages of birth and education, in a few brief years make of himself a poet of enviable rank? To answer this question we must understand, in the first place, the nature and temperament of the man himself and the influences under which he came; and in the second place, the composition and character of his poetry. From his correspondence, his poetry, his portraits, and the word-pictures of his friends we know the man fairly well. The declaration of his brother that "John is the very soul of manliness and courage" is now generally accepted as true. We know also that by nature he possessed a rare and delicate sensitiveness to impression. In the words of his friend, the artist Haydon, "He was in his glory in the fields. The humming of a bee, the sight of a flower, the glitter of the sun, seemed to make his nature tremble; then his eyes flashed, his cheek glowed, his mouth quivered." All of this we may not understand, nor can we measure and explain all the powers and workings of genius; but a knowledge of the facts makes the poetry of Keats more comprehensible. To one whose senses brought him so much of the richness of life, the ardent desire to preserve this treasure by the magic of art, in order to share it with others, must of necessity come. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.

Such delicate sensibilities and strong emotions require, for the purposes of art, powerful restraint and an adequate medium of expression. From his early friend and teacher, Charles Cowden Clarke, and through his friendship and intimacy with Leigh Hunt, Keats received much encouragement and inspiration at that impressionable age in the life of an artist when they are most needed. To Hunt this credit, at least, is due, although his influence on the early style of Keats may not always have been the best. In the society of these two friends and that of other men of culture and artistic temperament whom he soon met and made his lifelong friends, Keats began his travel in the realms of gold and his work of extending their boundaries. Fortunately the noblest and best held his attention. From Spenser, Shakespeare, Chapman, Milton, and Dryden he learned his profoundest lessons, and acquired a correct taste in poetry. Chaucer, Lyly, Drayton, Jonson, Marston, John Fletcher, Thomson, Chatterton, Burns; his famous contemporaries, Wordsworth and Shelley; the great Italians, Dante and Boccaccio; and many others influenced him more or less. He became an enthusiastic and critical reader of the English poets; he learned Italian that he might have access to the literature of Italy; and contemplated, if he did not actually begin, the study of Greek that he might come into direct contact with the culture and love of beauty which animated ancient Hellas, and with which he by nature had much in common.

From his cultured friends, therefore, and from his select reading and study Keats acquired by arduous and enthusiastic application the vocabulary of his art, but not without difficulties and failures. The influences under which he came varied in intensity, in degree of merit, and to some extent in the time at which they were operative, although the brevity of his career as a poet and the rapidity of his development make a strictly chronological arrangement of them impossible. With a mind plastic but retentive, undisciplined by a long and severe training in the classics of his own language or of any other, "with forced fingers rude," ere his Pegasus had "yet feathers enough to soar aloft into the fields of air," Keats in his early twenties eagerly set about the execution of a masterpiece, only to discover when the work was completed, if not before, that he had scattered his "leaves before the mellowing year"—an experience no doubt salutary for the growing powers of the poet. In this premature masterpiece, Endymion, he incorporated his gleanings in diction, both good and bad, from Hunt, Chatterton, Thomson, Collins, Chapman, William Browne, Shakespeare, and from the Elizabethan writers in general. Gradually, however, in his later poems the eccentricities and the extreme freedom or even license he had acquired from Hunt and William Browne, and especially from Chapman, gave way to the universality and judicious mastery he learned from Shakespeare. "As the great dramatist became daily a greater wonder to him, and he came to understand him to his very depths, he caught something of that power over language, which is indefinable because it can not be analyzed into mannerisms, and is only called Shakespearian from its inevitable fitness and its supreme felicity." The full truth of this matter, so admirably expressed by Professor de Sélincourt, becomes evident in comparing the diction of the early poems and Endymion with that of the poems published in Keats's last volume in 1820.

The vocabulary of Keats, because of its richness, delicacy, literary sources, mannerisms, and wide influence on later poets, has received no little attention. Richard Woodhouse, William T. Arnold, Sir Sidney Colvin, Mr. H. Buxton Forman, Mr. Robert Bridges, Dr. William A. Read, Professor Johannes Hoops, and especially Professor Ernest de Sélincourt, have contributed much to our better understanding of Keats and his poetry through their studies of his diction, demonstrating that he enriched his vocabulary from the general storehouse of English literature and not from any one writer or group of writers; that he employed comparatively few words without abundant precedent or close analogy; and that, in common with other writers of his time, he did much to revive the rich literary diction of a glorious past.

Through the Concordance it is now easier to obtain an accurate conception of the size of Keats's vocabulary in his poems, its variety, the extent of its excesses and mannerisms, and especially its sources. This work contains approximately 13,000 entries—or, exclusive of inflected forms, about 8,700 words. This number, of course, does not reveal how many words Keats actually knew, but is significant when we recall that the vocabulary of Milton's poems has been estimated at 7,000 or 8,000 and that of the Iliad and Odyssey at 9,000. When we consider the limited volume of his poetry, the number of words here ascribed to Keats indicates much richness and variety; yet we must not forget that this number is increased somewhat by his facility in making compounds out of common words and in freely employing derivatives from the same root—forms not to be classed as inflectional, or ruled out in counting. For instance, he employs a total of about 1,085 compound words, using at least 1,000 of them only once each, and the greater part of the remaining 85 not oftener than twice each. As a rule, he employs elsewhere the components of the compounds. As an illustration of the second method by which his vocabulary is increased, note the following derivatives (exclusive of compounds) from the same root: beam, beamily, beaminess, beamy; luxuriance, luxuriant, luxurious, luxuriously, luxury; leaf, leafiness, leafits, leafless, leafy; soft, soften, softling, softly, softness; gloom, gloominess, gloomings, glooms, gloomless, gloomy.

Although Keats's vocabulary does not, perhaps, contain a large number of root words, his poetry, nevertheless, shows variety in phrase and in combinations of words. Dew, for instance, has been classed among his favorite words; yet it has in his poetry no stereotyped modifier, as is often the case with a noun in Spenser, occurring only once with each of the following attributes: heavens', evening, rich, tremulous, ethereal, pearliest, odorous, drizzling, trickling, clammy, nectarous, authentic, sweet and virulent, fever, manna, wrathful. In addition we find dew of summer night, dew of her rich speech, dew of wild white rose, cold dews, self-same dews, dews of piety, dew-claw'd, dew-dabbled, dew-drop, dew-dropping, dewiness, dew-lipped, dew-sweet, each used only once, and dew-drops used twice. The adjective dewy modifies the following words: roses, flower, piping, buds, luxury, balm, flowers, forest, hand, blossoms, morning, gem, rhyme, rosary, bright, wine, sward, hours, birth, drops.

Moss, another favorite word with Keats, appears as golden moss, mound of moss, moss'd cottage trees, mossed oaks, mossed bark, leaves and mosses, mosses and flowers, mossie fountains, quaint mossiness of aged roots, mossiness of linnets' nests, moss-lain Dryads; while mossy qualifies bed (2), beds, fine, stone, stones, rocks, hill, footstool, cave, hillock, tread, green, ways, nest, cavern (2), place, water, brim, mound, glooms.

Still more interesting and convincing, although there are some repetitions, are the modifiers of the common word air: crystal, middle (3), wide (3), morning, moon-beamy, sunny, midnight, cool bleak, vacant, clear (2), clear summer, cool, sweet (2), mountain, warmer, temperate, wide-gaping, fresh slumberous, smoothest, dismal, cold bleak, warming, empty, Jove's, delicatest, spiritual, native, meadow, giddy, mid, void, Sicilian, purer, soft, haunted, holy, ebbing (2) rustled, dinn'd, warm (2), liegeless, pleased, silent, happy, demurest, wintry, summer, woodland, fragrant, shivering, visionary, open, dusk, refreshing, pervading, air of visions. Furthermore we find air-borne, airily, Lydian airs (2), lovely airs, hoity-toity airs, airs delicious, and airy modifying the following nouns: feel, march, swellings, trance, range, channels, stress, goal, voices (2), form, cradle, bourne, fellowship, planet, flowers, dome, texture, shore, maze, sleep. Lydian airs, and airy voices, each of which occurs twice, are clearly echoes from Milton.

The word eye and its various derivatives and compounds, occupying over two pages in the Concordance, offer an equally interesting and far more extensive study. One may note especially the compound forms of eyed: adder-eyed, black-eyed, blear-eyed, blue-eyed, bright-eyed, clear-eyed, dark-eyed, dulcet-eyed, dull-eyed, eager-eyed, fair-eyed, fine-eyed, fragrant-eyed, humble-eyed, keen-eyed, large-eyed, leaden-eyed, lidless-eyed, open-eyed, quick-eyed, sleepy-eyed.

These illustrations would indicate that Keats formed few stereotyped combinations, although we frequently meet with expressions in his poetry that reveal his indebtedness, of which he was doubtless unaware, to the long-accepted phraseology of poetry. Wordsworth declared his own freedom from this established poetic diction and his purpose to substitute "a selection of the language really spoken by men." Keats, however, distrustful of a language actually spoken by men, a language by necessity too familiar to him, proposed to master the poetic diction of the past and to adapt it to the manifold needs of his varying and lively senses and vivid imagination, to the adequate expression of his keen and delicate perception of beauty. He therefore shows no inclination to follow Wordsworth's experiment in the Lyrical Ballads. If it is proper to judge from the crudeness of Ben Nevis and The Cap and Bells, he acted wisely in keeping close to literary diction, succeeding far better even in the archaic language of The Eve of Saint Mark than in the colloquial speech of his own day. The words of his serious poetry that may be properly classed as vulgarisms are few in number, and are to be found for the most part in his early poems. Now and then, it must be admitted, the reader meets a word or phrase that forcibly recalls what Keats was trying to suppress in diction, and indicates that his powers of discrimination and good taste were not always alert or else were inadequate. The following list of words (with illustrations), the greater part of which have been noted by Professor de Sélincourt, contains the most noticeable of these defects in diction:

Bite. For Venus' pearly bite: ..... End. 4. 214
Dunce. That I am wise, that Pallas is a dunce— ..... End. 2. 799
Elegant. In elegant, pure, and aerial minds. ..... Ladies 28
Elegantly. . . . shadowy trees that lean
So elegantly o'er the waters' brim ..... Calidore 11
Giggle. And a giggle at a wonder; ..... Opposites 9
Got. When at night-fall among your books we got: ..... Clarke 118
His eyes went after them, until they got Near to a cypress grove, ... End. 4. 905
Idiot. When like a blank idiot I put on thy wreath, ... Hymn: Apollo 1. 8
Jaunty. Guess where the jaunty streams refresh themselves. .. *I stood 22
Like. Would come in these like accents; ..... Hyp. 1. 50
Would come in this-like accenting; ..... Fall Hyp. 1. 352
Smitten. The ever-smitten Hermes empty left ..... Lamia 1. 7
Though with their grace I was not oversmitten, ... Clarke 102
Squeeze. What gentle squeeze he gave each lady's hand! .... Calidore 81
My tenderest squeeze is but a giant's clutch. ..... End. 3. 574
One sign of real breath—one gentle squeeze, ... End. 4. 665
No soft squeeze for squeeze returneth, ... *You say 4. 2
Squeeze as lovers should ..... *You say 5. 3
Tiptop. Their tiptop nothings, ... End. 3. 15
Treat. There is not such a treat among them all,
. . . As a real woman, ... Lamia 1. 330

We should also note the usage of a few words, which, if less injudicious, is more colloquial or even juvenile—the Concordance furnishing ready access to certain specimens which are too numerous to quote: the use of so as an intensive adverb to express the inexpressible (so lingeringly, so elegantly, so refreshingly, so invitingly, so sweetly, so completely, Calidore 5, 11, 16, 31, 62, 63); the colloquial use of do for emphasis (do smile, End. 4. 115, etc.); the use of things instead of a more specific noun (diamond things, End. 4. 717, etc.); the excessive use, at least more than accords with proper artistic restraint, of the interjections ah and o; the frequent inelegant use of stare (*and kiss and stare, * I stood* 229, etc.), particularly in the love scenes of the early poems; and the rather questionable use of feel (airy feel | Of a light mantle, Calidore 139; deadly feel of solitude, End. 2. 284, etc.) and also shine (awful shine, End. 1. 352) as nouns. Keats freely employs verbs as nouns, e. g., amaze, annoy, assail, exclaim, proclaim, pierce, pant, shut, etc., a usage for which he had ample precedent in Elizabethan literature, particularly in Chapman. In passing, we might note the pronunciation of perhaps as a monosyllable in his early poems and of toward and towards as dissyllables accented on the last syllable.

There are also numerous words for which Keats shows an undue or peculiar preference, occasionally betraying a lack of discrimination as to their exact meaning. No doubt some of these words were a part of his speech. For instance, the word tease, of frequent occurrence in his poetry in varying degrees of precision, is with similar looseness freely employed in his correspondence. Without attempting to give a complete list, because the standard of selection must necessarily be more or less subjective and shifting, we may note some of the most obvious examples of such usage:

Ache and its derivatives: "my soul doth ache," "all his ugliness did ache," "aching ghost," "While I kiss to the melody, aching all through," etc.

Amorous: "amorous plea," "amorous breath," "amorous-aching," etc.

Balmy: "balmy pain," "balmy power," "balmy conscience," "balmy side."

Delicious and its derivatives: "delicious ramble," "delicious sounds," "delicious poisoner," "delicious lady," "delicious moan," "delicious tear," "delicious light," "dream deliciously," "ate deliciously," "ere deliciously she bow'd," "white deliciousness," "perverse deliciousness," etc.

Fragrant: "fragrant light," "fragrant-eyed."

Furrow: "a half-reaped furrow" [only instance].

Gordian: "gordian snake," "gordian shape."

Lush, its derivatives and compounds: "lush screen of drooping weeds," "lushest bluebell bed," "lush-leav'd rill," etc.

Luxury and its derivatives: "argent luxuries," "steps luxurious," "leafy luxury," "dewy luxury," etc.

Nest: "her [Madeline's] soft chilly nest," "her [Isabella's] downy nest," "in milky nest," etc.

Ooze, its derivatives and compounds: "odorous ooze," "oozy throne," "ooze-born goddess," etc.

Pant and its derivatives: "make its silvery splendour pant with bliss," "keep our souls in one eternal pant," "No man e'er panted for a mortal love," "panting light," "panting glow," "the stars drew in their panting fires," "panting miseries," "panting streets," etc.

Prance and its derivatives: "Noble soul that prancest," "my spirit leaps, and prances."

Pry and its derivatives: "Round about with eager pry," "Pry 'mong the stars," "we looked around with prying stare."

Tease and its derivatives: "How vain for me the niggard Muse to tease," "and Oberon will tease," "Streams subterranean will tease their granite beds," "Thou, silent form, dost tease us out of thought." Note that the phraseology of this remarkable line from the Ode on a Grecian Urn is repeated in the Epistle to John Hamilton Reynolds—"Things cannot to the will | Be settled, but they tease us out of thought."

As mentioned above, the use of this word is equally common and varied in Keats's correspondence: "if you have not been teased with that money affair," "so don't, because you have suddenly discovered a coldness in Haydon, suffer yourself to be teased," "In this world there is no quiet,—nothing but teasing and snubbing and vexation," "we need not be teased with grandeur and merit." He clung to the word until the last, for we find him writing at the beginning of his last illness: "Do not, my dear Brown, tease yourself about me."

Tiptoe: "on light tiptoe divine," "Came many a tiptoe, amorous cavalier," "The tiptoe marquis." Compare with these rather loose uses the admirable line: "Here are sweet peas, on tiptoe for a flight."

Tremble and its derivatives: "With all her limbs on tremble," "the warm tremble of a devout kiss," "Thy voice was at sweet tremble in mine ear," "trembled blossoms."

On another group of words for which Keats showed a noticeable preference, using them frequently but not peculiarly, the Concordance is the best commentary. Mr. Robert Bridges calls attention to a group of epithets in Keats's poetry which he designates as languid or suggestive of comfort: quiet, sweet, fair, white, green, old, young, little, tender, gentle, easy, fresh, pleasant; to another group as melting, fainting, swimming, swooning, and panting words; and to still another group which he says strongly appealed to Keats as they did to Shelley: wild, dark, deep, strange, lone, mysterious; and finally to the steady recurrence of certain objects in Keats's poetry: moss, eagles, echoes, bees, marble, silver, dew, nests, and weeds. Miss Alice E. Pratt in The Use of Color in the Verse of the English Romantic Poets, among other interesting facts regarding Keats's use of color words, notes the prominence given to those expressing "dazzle and sheen": bright, shining, gleaming, glistering, glossy, lustrous, lucid, luminous, crystal, spangly, phosphor, diamond; also to his preference for gold and amber. On the contrary the Concordance shows that words expressive of gloom, melancholy, sorrow, pain, etc., are conspicuous. Mr. David Watson has published an interesting essay on the relative importance of certain classes of epithets in Keats's poetry. For all of these discussions and their conclusions and for all others made with whatever degree of accuracy, the Concordance must remain the best test, making quickly and easily accessible the proof or refutation of all such criticism, and showing clearly the relative weight and importance of each component of Keats's vocabulary.

A prominent characteristic—it might almost be called a mannerism—of Keats's diction is his fondness for certain suffixes. With nouns the most noticeable are:

-ness(es) (beaminess, cragginess, dewiness, freshnesses, gloominess, leafiness, silkiness, taperiness, widenesses, etc.)

-ment(s) (ailment, concealment, dreariment, embracements, enthralments, entrancements, incitements, languishment, needments, ravishments, vestments, wonderment, etc.)

-ing(s) (archings, bleatings, cooings, glitterings, lute-breathings, sobbings, thunder-gloomings, curtaining, diamonding, garlanding, melodizing, proportioning, speeching, etc.)

Equally prominent are the following adjective endings:

-less (bloomless, cloudless, dreamless, nerveless, noiseless, passionless, quenchless, realmless, supperless, taintless, etc.)

-ous (battailous, beauteous, feverous, laborous, monstrous, murmurous, odorous, rubinous, sanguineous, slumberous, slumbrous, thund'rous, tremulous, tremulous-dazzlingly, umbrageous, verdurous, etc.)

-y (arrowy, bloomy, drouthy, fledgy, jaunty, liny, moon-beamy, orby, paly, pipy, sea-foamy, skyey, spherey, sphery, sun-beamy, surgy, etc.).

Of interest also are many unusual adverbs in -ly: beamily, bluely, cooingly, dancingly, disdainly, droopingly, drowningly, dyingly, fadingly, fearingly, greyly, hoveringly, palely, silverly, tremblingly, tremulous-dazzlingly, whitely, windingly, etc. All these endings are common enough and proper enough in poetry. It is only when they are so excessively used as to constitute a mannerism or usurp the place of more appropriate words that they become objectionable. In the use of these suffixes Keats at times is open to both these objections, but especially to the latter; for the use of too many abstract nouns, it must be confessed, in spite of his usual clear imagery, occasionally lends an undesirable vagueness to his style; while his habit of freely making words to order, even though by good analogy and precedent, was not always conducive to precision. To determine from whom Keats acquired the habit of using any particular suffix is difficult, because of the variety of possible sources. It is perhaps sufficient to remark that Hunt, Chapman, William Browne, and Spenser each employs some of these endings quite as freely as does Keats; and that the ending -ous which is prominent in his diction, but which has not attracted so much attention as the others, occurs frequently in Milton.

To make more evident the extent of these mannerisms in Keats's poetry, two complete lists, one of adjectives ending in -y, one of nouns in -ings, are printed below. These are in some ways the most interesting lists of words in this group, the first because of the metrical importance of the suffix -y, the second because of its unusual words. The number of occurrences of a word is indicated.

Keats employed various archaisms, words with which he was familiar in his reading and which he had learned as a part of the language of verse. "Having the sound of those auncient Poetes still ringing in his eares, he mought needes, in singing, hit out some of theyr tunes." With the exception of The Eve of Saint Mark, an attempt to reproduce an archaic dialect, it is unlikely that Keats made any conscious effort, as did Coleridge in The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, to revive old words for artistic or realistic purposes. It is more probable that with him, as with Charles Lamb, these words had lost their strangeness and had become a part of his literary heritage. He had a strong attachment for the somewhat archaic prefix a (on), employing it in the following words: a-beating, a-bleating, a-cold, a-down, a-hunger'd, a-maying, a-nudging, a-playing, a-row, a-snoring, a-tying. It also appears as a separate word: "a swooning," "a sleeping," "a slumbering," "a toying," "a weeping," "a conquering," "a playing," "a coming." Aside from these we occasionally meet in Keats's poetry such words as: amate, atween, bedight, besprent, dight, distraught, eld, eterne, foughten, griesly, mickle, perceant, ope, parle, pight, raught, seemlihed, shent, sith, tinct, wox, writhen, etc. Keats could, and no doubt did, learn the larger part of such words from Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespeare, and Chatterton.

Reference has already been made to the number of compounds in Keats's vocabulary. The greater part of these are without interest as individual words, in no way distinctive, original, or novel, although they may be more significant when considered in context or as epithets. Of the remainder, there are a few, difficult to classify, which impress the reader as being at least unusual, if not forceful. The following will serve to illustrate: crystal-smooth, fairy-delicate, honey-feel, lilly-feminine, men-slugs, moon-beamy, sapphire-warm, sea-spry, silver-clear, slaughter-sick, sun-beamy, tremulous-dazzlingly, wonder-draughts, zephyr-sights, etc. Some of these, it must be confessed, are more unique than felicitous. The words of another small class indicate Keats's tendency to make fine distinctions in color: bleak-brown, blood-red, blush-tinted, bright-blanched, cinque-coloured, dark-grey, death-pale, deep-damask'd, deep-green, forest-green, frost-white, gold-green, gold-tinted, hue-golden, jet-black, meadow-green, milk-white, purple-stained, rubious-argent, silver-white, thorny-green, vermillion-spotted.

Lastly, there remain to be considered those compounds which in many ways are the most interesting in Keats's diction, i. e., those containing a participle, present or past, as one element. Approximately one-third of his compounds belong to this class, about one-fourth of the total number ending in -'d or -ed. The participial adjective is common enough in the poets, but Keats, like Milton, Gray, and Thomson, found it effective, and generally used it with skill. By the formation and use of these compounds, especially in his later poems, where they are most abundant, he has undoubtedly enriched the language. Here, again, variety is conspicuous, for very few of these words occur more than once in his poetry. The following list of compounds in -'d and -ed will clearly indicate the extent and originality shown in Keats's use of this important group of words:

Keats's diction with its imperfections and merits, its rapid development under various influences, its peculiar charm and felicity in his last great poems, can not be understood apart from his love and philosophy of beauty. He had, as he said, "a yearning passion for the Beautiful," believing that "with a great Poet the sense of Beauty overcomes every other consideration, or rather obliterates all consideration"; that "the mighty abstract Idea of Beauty in all things," which he had, stifled "the more divided and minute domestic happiness"; that "What the Imagination seizes as Beauty must be Truth, whether it existed before or not"; that "Beauty is truth, truth beauty"; and that "A thing of beauty is a joy for ever."

This passion and philosophy became the informing principle of his art. "I find," he said, "I cannot exist without Poetry—without eternal Poetry." Such an existence demanded the search for truth, truth to be recognized by its beauty. "I never can," said he, "feel certain of any truth but from a clear perception of its beauty." Firm in this conviction, with senses ever improving in æsthetic delicacy and acumen, he sought the materials of his art and a suitable medium of expression. With this principle of selection constantly in operation, the improvement in his diction was rapid and marked. "Praise or blame," he wrote, "has but a momentary effect on the man whose love of beauty in the abstract makes him a severe critic of his own works. My own domestic criticism has given me pain without comparison beyond what Blackwood or the Quarterly could possibly inflict." Of his old mannerisms, affectations, and indiscretions in word and phrase, which were not beautiful because they were not essentially true, he could also have said:

> Leave them, O Muse! for thou anon wilt find
> Many a fallen old Divinity
> Wandering in vain about bewildered shores;

realizing that even in expression and diction

> 'tis the eternal law
> That first in beauty should be first in might.

The publication of a new concordance enhances the value of all concordances previously issued. While any poet of merit and rank, or of peculiar significance, remains inaccessible in such a work, his literary relationship to his predecessors, contemporaries, and successors is difficult or impossible to trace, and the whole chain of evidence by which literary criticism seeks the truth continues fragmentary. Keats, for example, "a true child of the Elizabethans," in the words of Sir Sidney Colvin, stands "in the most direct line of descent between the great poets of that age and those whom posterity has yet to estimate of our own day." His inheritance was rich, his legacy is as yet unmeasured. This Concordance, in conjunction with the Concordances of Spenser, Shakespeare, and Milton on the one side, and of Tennyson and Browning (in preparation) on the other, should prove of much assistance in measuring both the inheritance and the legacy; with those of Wordsworth and Shelley it should help in revealing the relation of Keats to his own literary age. Not only does a new concordance increase the value of all other concordances by making possible a more extensive comparative study of poets and a more intensive study of its own poet; but it also checks, corrects, and verifies much critical work already done. Because of his numerous literary ancestors, his place at the culmination of a most important literary movement, his large debt to the Elizabethans, and through them to ancient Greece; because of the almost universal admiration accorded him by later poets and the influence which his work has exerted on them; and finally, because of the richness and charm of his diction and the felicity of his phrase, Keats is fully deserving of careful study. Such study the editors hope this Concordance will aid and encourage.

The basic text for this Concordance is the Oxford Keats, edited by Mr. H. Buxton Forman. The work of recording was originally done from the issue of 1910, but has been carefully collated with the more recent issue of 1914, which contains in addition five newly-discovered poems. The page-numbers given in the Concordance correspond to those of the latter issue. For the convenience of those using the earlier issue, the following table records all differences in pagination:

Catch-title	1910	1914
Spenser, 1-8	286	285
Ode: Apollo, stanzas 4-5	287	286
Laurel	288	287
*Minutes are	...	288
*What is	...	288
Hymn: Apollo, stanzas 1, 2. 1-7	288	289
*As from	289	290
*Think not, stanzas 4-5	295	294
Sea	296	295
Oxford	297	296
Poet, 11-15	298	297
Love	298	297
Builder, 1-23	...	298
Builder, †9-12 (1910)=32-35 (1914)	298	299
*Which of	...	361
*You say	...	362

† The addition of twenty-three lines at the beginning of The Castle Builder has changed the line-numbering so that lines 1-48 of the issue of 1910 become lines 24-71 of the issue of 1914.

In the issue of 1914 the lines of Ode to Apollo, Hymn to Apollo, Stanzas to Miss Wylie, and * Think not are numbered consecutively throughout the poems, and not by stanzas, as in the issue of 1910. This change was made in the basic text after the Concordance was in press; consequently the references to these poems in this work conform to the line-numbering of the earlier issue.

Only two departures from the basic text have been made. The poem La Belle Dame sans Merci is well known in two versions, to neither of which did Keats give the preference. Therefore it has seemed wise, while adhering rigorously to the basic text, to record separately the lines of the other version which differ from it. The text used in the latter case is that found in Lord Houghton's Life and Letters of John Keats. The variants will be found under the respective words which they illustrate; they are placed after the other references, are inclosed in brackets, and have no page-numbers.

The only other deviation from the basic text is in the printing of line 234 of Sleep and Poetry. This line, with its context, appears thus in the Oxford edition:

> . . . the themes
> Are ugly cubs, the Poets Polyphemes
> Disturbing the grand sea.

The 1817 edition of the poem reads clubs instead of cubs. As neither reading has been universally accepted, the Concordance indicates both.

The following words are omitted in the Concordance:

a (article)	can (verb)	into	our	their	thy	with am	could	is	ours	theirs	to	ye
an	for	it	out	them	up	you
and	from	its	shall	these	upon	your are	he	may (verb)	she	they	us	yours at	her	might (verb)	should	thine	was been	him	must	that	this	we but	his	not	the	those	were
by	in	of	thee	thou	will (aux. verb)

Of the following words, which are recorded only in part, the personal pronouns are retained wherever they apparently refer to Keats himself; had, has, have, and would when they are used as principal verbs; be and on in a few cases where their use is so peculiar as to merit special notice:

be	has	I	mine	on
had	have	me	my	would

In the case of hyphened compounds, the second member of the compound has a cross-reference to the first. Two different spellings of the same word have cross-references to each other; and when there are three or more spellings, one has been regarded as standard and the rest have been referred to it, while under it have been noticed all the others.

This work was begun at Cornell University in the summer of 1913 by the six editors whose names appear on the title-page and who have shared alike the labors of compilation and proof-reading. While the work was in press and nearing completion, this pleasant and helpful association was broken on September 11, 1916, by the death of one of our number, Mrs. Laura Cooper Evans. Our sorrow finds mitigation in the abiding memory of one who did her share and did it well, and with whom it was an inspiration to labor.

Besides the editors, the following persons assisted in the compilation of the Concordance:

Miss Hester A. Austin
Miss Florence E. Axtell
Miss Marjorie L. Barstow
Miss Ellen L. Bower
Mrs. Rose C. Broughton
Miss Cora C. Carroll
Mrs. Margaret S. Cooney
Professor Lane Cooper
Miss Beulah M. Dayton
Miss Esther C. Dunn
Miss Grace B. Gardner
Mr. Harvey E. Gayman
Mr. Edward C. Leib
Mr. Thaddeus C. Logan
Miss Georgina Melville
Miss Winifred Moses
Miss Gertrude H. Nelson
Mr. Arthur I. Russell
Miss Anna V. Schumann
Miss Grace L. Surdam
Miss Grace M. Stelter
Mr. Harold E. Tenny
Mr. Frederick A. Thayer
Miss Sarah L. Weissmann

To these collaborators, who gave their services gratuitously and generously, the editors extend their hearty thanks. They are also grateful to the Concordance Society for its advice and encouragement; to the Oxford University Press, which furnished complete proof-sheets of its issue of 1914 before the issue itself was ready; to Sir Sidney Colvin for manuscript copies of the poems which he recently discovered; to the John Lane Company of New York for permission to reproduce from The Keats Letters, Papers, and Other Relics Joseph Severn's miniature of Keats; and especially to Professor Lane Cooper, who has freely given to the editors the benefit of his wide experience in the making of concordances; and finally, to the Carnegie Institution of Washington for the publication of this work.

Of all the shades that slanted o'er the green. ... 3 *I stood 14
And taper fingers catching at all things, ... 4 *I stood 59
To bind them all about with tiny rings. ..... 4 *I stood 60
Playing in all her innocence of thought. ..... 5 *I stood 100
Coming into the blue with all her light. ..... 6 *I stood 115
Of this fair world, and all its gentle livers ; .... 6 *I stood 117
Thee must I praise above all other glories ..... 6 *I stood 123
Charms us at once away from all our troubles : 6 *I stood 138
They gave each other's cheeks ; with all their sighs, ... 6 *I stood 145
A little space, with boughs all woven round ; ... 7 *I stood 166
And in the midst of all, a clearer pool ..... 7 *I stood 167
That sweetest of all songs, that ever new, ... 7 *I stood 182
Of all the brightness that mine eyes have seen ! 8 *I stood 206
As thou exceedest all things in thy shine, ... 8 *I stood 207
And smiles at the far clearness all around, ... 11 Calidore 7
All the soft luxury ..... 13 Calidore 92
All the green leaves that round the window clamber, ... 14 Calidore 136
Of all unworthiness ; and how the strong of arm 15 Calidore 144
Lovely the moon in ether, all alone : ..... 15 Calidore 157
In this little dome, all those melodies strange, 17 Shell 33
Of all that ever charm'd romantic eye : ..... 22 *Now Morning 24
And all around it dipp'd luxuriously ..... 22 *Now Morning 28
Outvieing all the buds in Flora's diadem. ..... 22 *Now Morning 36
Of all that's high, and great, and good, and healing. ..... 24 Mathew 10

Down a precipitous path, as if impell'd. .....125 End. 3. 489
As over them a gnarled staff she shook. .....125 End. 3. 508
Groan'd one and all, as if some piercing trial ..126 End. 3. 516
In vain; remorseless as an infant's bier .....126 End. 3. 520
For the whole herd, as by a whirlwind writhen, 126 End. 3. 529
"Only I pray, as fairest boon, to die, ...127 End. 3. 550
"Adieu, sweet love, adieu!"—As shot stars fall, 128 End. 3. 600
Came salutary as I waded in; .....128 End. 3. 610
The sea-swell took her hair. Dead as she was ..129 End. 3. 625
Fleet as an arrow through unfathom'd brine, ...129 End. 3. 627
Away from me again, as though her course ....129 End. 3. 649
He tore it into pieces small as snow .....132 End. 3. 749
Ah, gentle! 'tis as weak as spider's skein; .....132 End. 3. 757
And, as he pass'd, each lifted up his head, ...133 End. 3. 785
As doth a flower at Apollo's touch. .....133 End. 3. 786
Joyous all follow'd as the leader call'd, ...134 End. 3. 813
Down marble steps; pouring as easily .....134 End. 3. 814
As hour-glass sand,—and fast, as you might see 134 End. 3. 815
Joyous, and many as the leaves in spring, ...134 End. 3. 839
For what poor mortals fragment up, as mere ..135 End. 3. 845
As marble was there lavish, to the vast .....135 End. 3. 846
As large, as bright, as colour'd as the bow ....135 End. 3. 850
Ere it burst open swift as fairy thought, ...135 End. 3. 857
Far as the mariner on highest mast .....135 End. 3. 866
So wide was Neptune's hall: and as the blue ...135 End. 3. 868
But sooth'd as now, flash'd sudden everywhere, 135 End. 3. 873
A light as of four sunsets, blazing forth .....135 End. 3. 877
As breezeless lake, on which the slim canoe ....136 End. 3. 880
Of feather'd Indian darts about, as through ....136 End. 3. 881
In such a place as this. O do not curse, ...137 End. 3. 939
As newly come of heaven, dost thou sit .....138 End. 3. 962
Anxious as hind towards her hidden fawn. .....141 End. 4. 43
As doth the voice of love: there's not a breath ..142 End. 4. 82
Thought he, "Why am I not as are the dead, ..143 End. 4. 89
And so he groan'd, as one by beauty slain. .....143 End. 4. 98
Sweet as a muskrose upon new-made hay; .....143 End. 4. 102
To meet oblivion."—As her heart would burst ..144 End. 4. 124
As that thou speak'st of? Are not these green nooks .....144 End. 4. 127
Cold as my fears. .....146 End. 4. 187
"And as I sat, over the light blue hills .....146 End. 4. 193
And I forgot thee, as the berried holly .....146 End. 4. 205

Pelted with flowers as he on did pass .....147 End. 4. 216
Yet with as sweet a softness as might be .....149 End. 4. 296
As of a thunder cloud. When arrows fly .....149 End. 4. 326
High as the eagles. Like two drops of dew ....150 End. 4. 348
It seem'd as when around the pale new moon ..150 End. 4. 368
Of vision search'd for him, as one would look ...151 End. 4. 391
Slowly they sail, slowly as icy isle .....151 End. 4. 405
His heart leapt up as to its rightful throne, ...153 End. 4. 445
Hath no revenge in it: as it is whole .....153 End. 4. 471
Even when I feel as true as innocence? .....153 End. 4. 474
Slowly she rose, as though she would have fled, 154 End. 4. 503
No sound so loud as when on curtain'd bier ....155 End. 4. 530
Warbling the while as if to lull and greet .....156 End. 4. 560
Speeding away swift as the eagle bird? .....157 End. 4. 594
Warm as a dove's nest among summer trees, ...159 End. 4. 666
And where dark yew trees, as we rustle through, 159 End. 4. 673
Answering thus, just as the golden morrow ....160 End. 4. 726
Mourn'd as if yet thou wert a forester;— .....162 End. 4. 779
O feel as if it were a common day; .....163 End. 4. 820
Free-voic'd as one who never was away. .....163 End. 4. 821
As say these sages, health perpetual .....163 End. 4. 831
His eyes are on thee bent, as thou didst poize ...164 End. 4. 843
'Mong men, are pleasures real as real may be: 164 End. 4. 852
With thee as a dear sister. Thou alone, ...164 End. 4. 866
As feels a dreamer what doth most create .....165 End. 4. 889
And so remain'd as he a corpse had been .....166 End. 4. 919
And, slowly as that very river flows, ...166 End. 4. 925
As though they jests had been: nor had he done 166 End. 4. 947
Until that grove appear'd, as if perchance, ...167 End. 4. 949
Gave utterance as he enter'd: "Ha! I said, ...167 End. 4. 951
Wan as primroses gather'd at midnight .....167 End. 4. 970
And said in a new voice, but sweet as love, ...167 End. 4. 978
And as she spake, into her face there came ....167 End. 4. 982
Light, as reflected from a silver flame: .....167 End. 4. 983
As was thy cradle; hither shalt thou flee .....168 End. 4. 995
That from a whiteness, as the lilly clear, ...171 Lamia 1. 24
There as he stood, he heard a mournful voice, ..172 Lamia 1. 35
Such as once heard, in gentle heart, destroys ..172 Lamia 1. 36
And full of silver moons, that, as she breathed, 172 Lamia 1. 51
As Proserpine still weeps for her Sicilian air. ..172 Lamia 1. 63
Came, as through bubbling honey, for Love's sake, ...172 Lamia 1. 65
"Break amorous through the clouds, as morning breaks, ...173 Lamia 1. 77
"And, swiftly as a bright Phœbean dart, ...173 Lamia 1. 78
"Free as the air, invisibly, she strays .....173 Lamia 1. 94
"To wander as she loves, in liberty. .....174 Lamia 1. 109
"If thou wilt, as thou swearest, grant my boon!" .....174 Lamia 1. 111
"A woman's shape, and charming as before. ....174 Lamia 1. 118
Nor grew they pale, as mortal lovers do. .....175 Lamia 1. 145
And, as the lava ravishes the mead, ...175 Lamia 1. 157
Melted and disappear'd as suddenly; .....175 Lamia 1. 166
As though in Cupid's college she had spent .....176 Lamia 1. 197
He would return that way, as well she knew, ..177 Lamia 1. 221
"Even as thou vanishest so shall I die. .....178 Lamia 1. 260
"Thy spheres, and as thy silver proxy shine? ..178 Lamia 1. 267
And as he from one trance was wakening .....179 Lamia 1. 296
As those who, safe together met alone .....179 Lamia 1. 302
Inhabited her frail-strung heart as his. .....179 Lamia 1. 309
Days happy as the gold coin could invent .....179 Lamia 1. 313
Till she saw him, as once she pass'd him by, ...179 Lamia 1. 315
Late on that eve, as 'twas the night before .....179 Lamia 1. 319
As a real woman, lineal indeed .....180 Lamia 1. 332
As men talk in a dream, so Corinth all, ...180 Lamia 1. 350
Her fingers he press'd hard, as one came near ..180 Lamia 1. 363
Lycius shrank closer, as they met and past, ...181 Lamia 1. 366
Mild as a star in water; for so new, ...181 Lamia 1. 382
Breath'd from the hinges, as the ample span ....181 Lamia 1. 387
"And triumph, as in thee I should rejoice .....183 Lamia 2. 60
Fierce and sanguineous as 'twas possible .....184 Lamia 2. 76
"As still I do. Hast any mortal name, ...185 Lamia 2. 88
"Even as you list invite your many guests; ....186 Lamia 2. 98
"But if, as now it seems, your vision rests ....186 Lamia 2. 99
Throughout, as fearful the whole charm might fade. .....186 Lamia 2. 124
Silently paced about, and as she went, ...187 Lamia 2. 134
As though some knotty problem, that had daft 188 Lamia 2. 160
And solve and melt:—'twas just as he foresaw. 188 Lamia 2. 162
To the high roof, still mimick'd as they rose ....189 Lamia 2. 181
High as the level of a man's breast rear'd .....189 Lamia 2. 184
High as the handles heap'd, to suit the thought 190 Lamia 2. 218
Of every guest; that each, as he did please, ...190 Lamia 2. 219
Unweave a rainbow, as it erewhile made .....190 Lamia 2. 237
As pale it lay upon the rosy couch: .....191 Lamia 2. 250
From Lycius answer'd, as heart-struck and lost, 192 Lamia 2. 293
Keen, cruel, perceant, stinging: she, as well ....192 Lamia 2. 301
As her weak hand could any meaning tell, ...192 Lamia 2. 302
As were his limbs of life, from that same night. 192 Lamia 2. 308
And constant as her vespers would he watch, ..194 Isa. 3. 5
Fell thin as a young mother's, who doth seek ..195 Isa. 5. 3
Yet were these Florentines as self-retired .....198 Isa. 17. 1
As two close Hebrews in that land inspired, ...198 Isa. 17. 3

Clearly she saw, as other eyes would know .....206 Isa. 46. 3
With death, as life. The ancient harps have said, 207 Isa. 50. 4
With tears, as chilly as a dripping well, ...208 Isa. 51. 6
And why it flourish'd, as by magic touch; .....209 Isa. 58. 3
And when she left, she hurried back, as swift ..210 Isa. 59. 5
As bird on wing to breast its eggs again; .....210 Isa. 59. 6
And, patient as a hen-bird, sat her there .....210 Isa. 59. 7
Numerous as shadows haunting faerily .....213 St. Agnes 5. 3
As she had heard old dames full many times declare. .....213 St. Agnes 5. 9
As, supperless to bed they must retire, ...214 St. Agnes 6. 6
And as she mutter'd "Well-a—well-a-day!" ...217 St. Agnes 13. 3
Pale, lattic'd, chill, and silent as a tomb. .....217 St. Agnes 13. 5
As spectacled she sits in chimney nook. .....217 St. Agnes 15. 5
"It shall be as thou wishest," said the Dame: 219 St. Agnes 20. 1
Out went the taper as she hurried in; .....221 St. Agnes 23. 1
As though a tongueless nightingale should swell 221 St. Agnes 23. 8
As are the tiger-moth's deep-damask'd wings; ..221 St. Agnes 24. 6
As down she knelt for heaven's grace and boon; 221 St. Agnes 25. 3
As though a rose should shut, and be a bud again. .....223 St. Agnes 27. 9
Noiseless as fear in a wide wilderness, ...223 St. Agnes 28. 7
Impossible to melt as iced stream: .....225 St. Agnes 32. 4
Upon his knees he sank, pale as smooth-sculptured stone. .....225 St. Agnes 33. 9
Into her dream he melted, as the rose .....226 St. Agnes 36. 5
